Techniques such as fragmentation of lines, repetition, and rhyme are vehicles that enable greater expression in writing. Many persons in our lives are decidedly vulnerable.

Those images are best used when mixed into the narratives sparsely so that they When we replace words, drag our sentences out mostly for the sake of having longer sentences, or try to write in a way that neither feels nor sounds natural to our own writer voice, we fall victim to the dreaded purpling of our prose. The last haiku is significant to me—how we hold on to things the light, routines in order to keep going, in order to teach one more student, to cast one last line on the river before it is too late.

I have deep admiration for authors who take the time to use language as musical
