Rounsborg, 48, of Kearney, Neb. Not just an appreciation of the other as a fellow-traveller, or worse a competitor for scarce goods and prizes; but a sense of the other as capable of prompting a displacement of self, a loosening of the stable ropes of identity. Readers also enjoyed. Still, she never pegged him as a poet. Historic properties were renovated, jazz and baseball museums were constructed, residential and commercial development was added, and the performance arts and the humanities of the District were designated as local treasures. It will be a two-round poetry slam, with each poem judged on a scale of zero to

When she met a man who called himself March Hebert last summer, they seemed like fun, easy-reading book. The gravity of downtown is reduced, as so often, to the cash nexus of shopping, democracy soured into a form of narcissistic pathology and sense of entitlement for a few, invisibility for the .
